Synopsis

Originally based on 24 poems by the German lyric poet Wilhelm Müller “Winterreise” tells the tale of a lone wanderer who finds both love and betrayal along a winding and fantastic journey.

The wanderer arrives in an idyllic village in May. There he befriends a family of three, and they invite him to live with them. While there, he falls in love with their beautiful daughter, and his love is reciprocated, or so he is led to believe. The daughter, however, rejects him to marry a wealthy suitor with the approval of her parents. It is now Winter, and heartbroken, he leaves his adopted home in the dead of night. Not before first writing a farewell message to his beloved.

After traveling a while, he speaks of the sense of security and comfort he felt when reclining under the branches of a Linden tree. A feeling that lingers with him even after he has departed his former haven. He falls asleep and dreams of springs gone by, of colorful flowers and green meadows. When awakened by the sound of a distant rooster crowing, he is disheartened to realize that it is still Winter. The loneliness and cold darkness that has defined his journey still surround him.

He eventually reaches another small town and decides to linger there for some time. Upon hearing the postman approach, he sings of his desire to receive a letter from his beloved. Ultimately his hopes are again shattered when the postman completes his delivery, and there is no letter for him. Despondent, in the final song of the cycle, he asks the town’s Hurdy Gurdy man if he will remember his tale and set it to music.
